Southern Politics

New York Times

In view of the course of Mahone and his party the question arises which is the most natural course in Virginia or any other State for a real or alleged Republican or Democratic party to be built. The general intelligence of the people of a low order of mind both in the past and present is in a backward state at the present time. There appears to lack the means of organization and individuality The large population only in the towns is in a condition, and at best only the smaller town and rural negro vote lightly in any of the republican parties are not very strong in the South Hardly enough wanted to put a ballot in the box of either social and political fly at any possible election Parties than gradual extinction Independent movements are apt to be personal cliques or one issue coalitions They are apt to fail. Local combinations are directed by men whose ambition is to be off-hand in the narrowest sense

THE CANADIAN ROAD.

An idea seems to be making its way into the eastern mind that the Canadian Pacific railway is destined to play a highly important part in the transportation system of this continent. A writer in the New York Times insists that the construction of the road is a matter of portentous significance to the United States; and he therefore sounds the note of alarm on the subject, with special reference, however, to what he conceives to be its relation to the American tariff. He also points out some of the striking advantages which the Canadian Pacific will have over its American competitors for northwestern and Pacific traffic, among which are its enormous subsidy in cash, lands and free gift of 750 miles of railway completed by the Canadian government, the total being estimated at a value of $100,000,000. In addition to this the railway and its equipment and the stock of the company are forever exempted from taxation; its land grant is exempted from taxation for twenty years, or until sold, and the rails and other iron materials used in constructing the railway and telegraph lines are exempt from duties—this last concession alone being valued at $10,000,000. The line runs through a fertile wheat belt extending from the Red river to the Rocky mountains, the whole distance being nearly a level plain; and though the company commenced construction only last summer, it has pushed the work with such energy that 100 miles are now completed and another 100 miles graded, and in another year the road will probably reach the base of the Rocky mountains. Work on the Pacific division is also in progress, and many thousands of Chinese are immediately to be brought over to reinforce the working parties. On this end of the line there are so many difficulties that it can hardly be regarded as probable that the road will be finished through in less than five years. But it will be completed undoubtedly, and five years is no long time. The Times writer argues that the enormous subsidy paid for construction of the road, and the exemption of its material from duties, etc., will enable it to carry freight much more cheaply than the American Pacific roads, which are not so favored with subsidies and exemptions, and are moreover restricted with heavy duties on iron and steel, and hence it is suggested that the Canadian Pacific must take a large share of the trans-continental traffic. Those facts are certainly worthy of notice; the argument for reduction of the American duties on iron and steel is also of considerable weight in fact all the arguments; there is probably little reason to fear that the Rocky chain of the Pacific trade will fall to the Canadian road. For the reasons above pointed out, that road will have advantages, indeed; but those will be in large degree overcome by the fact that other roads will have access to the principal centers of trade on the Pacific coast, while the Canadian will not; that the road has so far north that it will be more obstructed by snows than any other; that local traffic, for through traffic, must be the chief support of every road, and that the Canadian road cannot reach the local traffic that will tackle all the more southern lines, where the climatic advantages are great. Again, the western division of the Canadian road, for a distance of 900 to 1000 miles, traverses a country which is extremely mountainous, is rich only in very heavy snow falls and cannot be settled to any considerable extent; hence this division will be expensive to operate and will have little or no local business. For these reasons there need be no apprehensions rising in the Canadian road, with all its advantages. Both the Northern Pacific had these advantages, added to such as it now possesses, it would be able to serve the country at lower rates than it now possibly can.

THE PETITION OF NORTHERN IDAHO.

The people of Northern Idaho do not give up their effort to obtain the separation of their section of the territory from "an unnatural political alliance" as they justly term it, with Southern Idaho. Their desire is to be attached to Washington Territory, and they consistently urge it upon the attention of congress. A committee appointed by the citizens of the northern section of the territory have addressed a memorial to congress, giving a history of the movement to secure the separation, and setting forth the reasons why the separation is desired. The document is a strong and conclusive one. Idaho has a most unsightly form. To contour on the map is that of a shoestring of leaves, very badly trimmed, or not trimmed at all. The length of the territory from north to south is equal to that of Oregon and Washington together. Its extends from Nevada and Utah to British Columbia; and the northern part, having an extension of three hundred miles, is from forty to seventy miles only in breadth, and is separated from the main body of the territory by a high, rugged and practically impassable range of mountains known as the Salmon River range. There is no way of getting from one section of the territory to the other except by passing round through Oregon and Washington to the west, or through Montana to the east. The committee show that the unnatural boundaries of Northern Idaho are the result of ill-considered action taken in fixing the limits of Washington and Montana; that the people of the northern part of the territory are subjected to great inconvenience and expense by the present arrangement, which would be obviated entirely by union with Washington; that the two sections have no need whatever of Northern Idaho, and would have harmonious development without it; that no material or political interest of Southern Idaho will be affected by the separation of Northern Idaho to Washington, while the people of Northern Idaho would be accommodated and benefited in every way by the change. There is certainly an excellent reason why the prayer of the people of Northern Idaho should not be granted. The political geography of the territory ought to be made to conform to its natural geography, since it can so easily be done.

SHEEP AND WOOL.

An authority on wool-growing points out certain important facts which ought to be known and observed, so that the wool-grower may breed towards uniformity, secure a profitable fiber and improve the character of his flock. This authority says that if we consider the needed qualities in a good merino combing wool, we shall find them nearly the same the world over. The essentials to a profitable and high-priced article are about as follows: Fineness of fibre, length of fibre, elasticity of fibre, lustre or lustre of fibre. The best fibre, as regards the first requirement named, measures under the microscope but 1-1927th of an inch in diameter when unwashed, and 1-1405th of an inch when washed. The fibre should be from 2½ to 3½ inches in length. The elasticity and softness should be great. Clothes made of poor, non-elastic wool get out of shape. Combing wool should separate like skeins of silk, so that there is less waste in manufacture. The color should be bright, clear and lustrous, but light, so as to receive the most delicate dyes. The very best wools will take dyes as well as silk does.

If a wool grower proposes to produce these best grades of wool, he must keep his flock in a region free from thorns and burs and clinging seeds. Annoying insects, such as ticks, if numerous, irritate the animals and destroy the silkiness of the wool. The use of a good sheep dip prevents this trouble. Keeping sheep in too dry a region injures the yolk of the wool. The yolk is a soap-like material which is produced by glands to nourish the wool. It is composed of animal oils and potash. The finest wools contain the greatest percentage of this substance. It is the best known substance for washing or scouring wools. Wool of Southdown or Leicestershire sheep contains twenty per cent. yolk; the best merino fleeces contain from forty to seventy-five per cent. in weight of this substance.

A SENSIBLE PROTEST.

Henry F. Knapp, a civil engineer of Brooklyn, has addressed an open letter to congress and to boards of trade and commerce throughout the United States on the proposed improvement of the Mississippi river. It is a complete exposure of the fallacy of the scheme of confining the waters of the great river by levees. The Mississippi river commission, constituted by congress, has recommended to the house committee on commerce a plan which the latter have agreed to adopt. Briefly stated, it proposes to confine the river from Cairo to New Orleans within embankments erected so as to give a channel three thousand feet in width. But all reports show that the river from Cairo down to the Gulf has been forty to one hundred miles wide during two months past. How could this vast volume of water be confined within the limits proposed? The levees required would be from three hundred to five hundred feet high. Would water, asks Mr. Knapp, run into the channel against this height? On the contrary, supposing it possible to make the mud walls stand, the waters would flow back over all the states of the upper Mississippi valley. But of course they could not be made to stand. There is not labor enough on the planet to maintain them against the pressure of so vast a flood. Again, Mr. Knapp says that Capt. Eads has curtailed by his dams across the heads of the Mississippi passes the discharging capacity of the months of the delta, until the outflow of the river has been impeded by one-third; and besides, there are dykes and dams on the river and branches above which have the same effect; so that, but for the outlets and crevasses which have been forced by the great pressure of waters the floods would have wrecked every town and city on the river from Cairo to the Gulf, including New Orleans. The fact, then, is apparent that the levee system will not do. The river must spread, its waters must have an outlet, or the whole upper valley will be flooded. Here is common sense against theory and jobbery; but it is by no means certain that it will prevail. The $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 that would go into the job is too tempting a bait and the average congressmen thinks his greatness depends on his success in getting money from the treasury, no matter for what object. His constituents want money from the treasury spent among them, and he must satisfy them or give way to some man who can.

THE USUAL RESULT.

The telegraph announces that the relief ship Rogers, dispatched to the northern seas nearly a year ago to search for the Jeannette, has been burned and sunk and that her crew are somewhere in Siberia waiting to be sent for. This is the usual result of Arctic expeditions. The Jeannette expedition was foolish business, the scheme of a reckless sensationist who wanted to advertise his newspaper and who cared nothing for science. It was a scheme to keep Bennett and his Herald on the public tongue, and disaster has served to do this just as well as the highest success would have done. But there was no chance of success. There was not the slightest prospect of the Jeannette's doing anything that would be of any practical value to anybody. But hare-brained people were not wanting for this fool's errand, Mr. Bennett with a great flourish put up the money and away sailed the Jeannette into the jaws of death. The melancholy result is fresh in the public mind. Seventeen of her company have miserably perished in Siberia, five others are maimed for life, and now the Rogers, which was sent to search for the lost vessel has gone down and somebody in turn must go search for her survivors. It is time for this dangerous experience and foolish business to stop. Already too many lives have been sacrificed and too much money spent to gratify the vanity of reckless adventurers.

If it were worth the trouble it might be interesting to inquire where the Port Townsend Argus got the information that THE OREGONIAN criticised President Arthur's veto of the Chinese immigration bill on the ground that "the republican party would lose strength in consequence of it." This journal's criticisms were based on entirely different grounds. The political or partisan bearings of the veto were only incidentally mentioned, and it was suggested that they might not be worth mentioning at all. The Port Townsend paper is the only journal printed on this coast which has defended the veto. Its motive seems to spring from a loyal supposition that the accidental president of the United States has become so great a man that he can do no wrong; that his judgment on a question that he knows nothing about is better than that of the whole people of this coast who know all about it; that his wisdom is superior to that of congress; that in his infallibility he should be supported in violating a distinct pledge which his party gave in its platform when it nominated him for the vice presidency, and that the Morey letter, which Garfield and the whole country repudiated, contains in fact the true American doctrine. Expressly to enable this country to limit or suspend the immigration of Chinese, the original treaty was modified; and the republican party pledged itself to carry out this restrictive policy. Mr. Arthur accepted his nomination under these conditions; yet now he says it would be a violation of the treaty to do what his party pledged itself to do, and what the treaty itself was expressly modified to allow. We can see no occasion for any citizen to be so "loyal" as to excuse the president's faithless act—even though the Pacific Mail Company, which makes money by carrying coolies, and the manufacturing bosses who want cheap labor, pressed him never so hard.

At the republican convention to-day the counties will be very fully represented by the delegates in person. Comparatively few proxies will be reported. For governor several candidates are talked of, including Moody of Wasco, Hare of Washington and Kelsey of Benton. Moody seems to have more strength of a positive kind than any other who has yet been named. Kelsey, however, claims strong support. Hare, it is understood, positively declines. Possibly the man who will be nominated by the convention has not yet been much talked of for the honor. For congress George will have no opposition. Earhart will be nominated for secretary of state, without a contest. There are several candidates for state treasurer, each of whom is actively supported. The most prominent are Hirsch of Marion, Chapman of Clackamas and Monteith of Linn. Hirsch clearly has a stronger support than any one of his competitors. We hear of no opposition to Lord for the supreme bench. For superintendent of public instruction the principal candidates appear to be Powell of Linn and McElroy of Benton. D. C. Ireland is a candidate for state printer. The convention will assemble at Turn Halle on Fourth and Yamhill streets at ten o'clock this morning.

John Taylor, president of the Mormon church, said to his people in conference two weeks ago: "Our enemies desire us to throw away our wives and trust them as outcasts. In the name of God we will not do it. We will not turn them out, but will stand by them and protect them in time, and reign with them in eternity when others are weltering under the wrath of God."

The national debt less cash in the treasury on the 1st of the present month was $8,726,266,422 35. Since August, 1865, when the debt reached its highest limit, the total amount of reduction has reached $1,000,000,000, while the interest has been so far reduced that it will be far easier to pay the remainder of the debt than it was to discharge the part already paid.

CROSSMAN WITH MALICIOUS MISCHIEF.—He was yesterday commenced in the state circuit court against Dr. H. E. Jones by W. J. Patton, to recover $5,000 damages for alleged malpractice. The plaintiff claims that about September 6, 1881, he employed the defendant to heal his foot, which was severely bruised; that neither proper skill nor care was exercised in treating him, and that his leg was unnecessarily amputated directly below the knee. After the first amputation it was thought necessary to again amputate the limb, which was done, but he carelessly treated the wound, so that he was compelled to suffer a third operation of the same nature. He alleges that by his sickness during the twelve months his business was damaged to the extent of $500, and he had to pay $200 for medical treatment.

STREET AROUND STEAM RAILWAY.—By reference to the planned proceedings of will be seen that D. P. Dodd and associates have asked the city for the right to operate a street railway. The route proposed is from the corner of Front and Washington to Washington to E, to E to North Fifteenth, to North Fifteenth to L, to L to North Twentieth, thence north to the city limit, also from the corner of Twelfth and Washington up Twelfth to Northrup, east on Salmon to Eleventh, south on Eleventh to Market. It is understood that the enterprise is backed by sufficient capital to insure the completion at an early day. Consideration of the proposed line will meet the approbation, and better still the patronage of a considerable portion of Portland's population.

THE ASTORIA AFFAIR.—The line to Astoria having gone down yesterday in a storm, further news from the stampeded machines of Davish could not be obtained. Capt. Reed, owner of the Storm King, arrived here up the Columbia yesterday afternoon, provided with almost positive information that Pendleton's boat had been slaughtered. He said to an OREGONIAN reporter that he had not been chagrined. The sailing boat referred to in the first dispatch came towards the vessel for the express purpose of getting Pendleton off, but he jumped a low remarking, it is understood, that Crocker, the mate, too soon. Pendleton secreted himself until the excitement made has secreted himself until the excitement made has somewhat subsided, when he will probably shall have ventured.

CASE CONTINUED.—William Nelson, who was arrested for larceny of several articles from Mellin Bros. & Co.'s store, was arraigned for examination in the police court yesterday. Upon motion of Deputy District Attorney Mulkey, the case was continued until to day. No new facts in connection with the case have come to light, neither were the results which Nelson claimed to have had for money paid as auctioneer for the merchandise found in his house.

DEATH OF MRS. MANCIET.—Early yesterday morning Mrs. Peter Mancliet, widow of the late Pierre Mancliet, died at her residence, corner First and Clay streets. She never recovered from the shock of her husband's death. Mrs. Mancliet will be remembered by many for numerous deeds of unostentatious charity. The funeral will take place from the cathedral.

RARE SIGHT.—A remarkable sight last evening was the view of the planet Jupiter immediately upon the moon's limb. Had the sky remained clear a beautiful occultation of the planet would have been witnessed in a short time. Such a sight is a rare one. By to-night the moon will be considerably in advance of the planet.

DR. ANDERSON'S REMAINS INTERRED.—The remains of Dr. Geo. W. Anderson were yesterday buried in Potter's field. No answer was received in reply to the telegram sent to his wife in Tennessee, and it is thought she has moved from her former home.

VESTRYMEN.—The following gentlemen have been elected vestrymen of the Trinity Episcopal church of this city for the ensuing year: M. P. Deady, S. B. Wilson, B. Gibau, C. E. Lewis, G. H. Flanders, L. Brooke, R. Weeks and G. N. Scott.

U. S. CIRCUIT COURT.—Judge Deady will announce an opinion in this court this morning in the demurrers to the pleas in the timber cases of the United States against Smith, same against Young and same against White.

NOT GUILTY.—The cases of assault and battery against John and Michael McNulty, who were charged with having assaulted and beaten Alexander Hunter and his brother, were dismissed in the police court yesterday.

ARRIVED.—The Oregon reached her dock here at 8 o'clock last night. The Astoria line was down, time for arrival there was not telegraphed.

RECEPTION AND SOCIAL.

ECHO SONG.

From the French.

I call across the rolling plain,
My mountains from your sleep awake,
O stupid rocks your slumber break,
Hear and give back my words again!"
And hark! the echo doth rebound!
Its accents made the soul of sound,
Replying to my laughing voice,
"Rejoice!"

There loitereth by a flock of sheep,
Above whose clamorous bleating swells
The tinkling of their hundred bells,
In sympathy with me, the steep
Takes up the wild pell-mell of sound,
It makes jargon human in rebound,
Compels uproar to flow along
In song.

Where curves the lake's green crescent coast,
The fishers flock with cry and shout,
With song and shout ashore, afloat;
Yet all the babble of their host
Melts into music in rebound,
Confusion into tuneful sound.
One heart of overflowing cheer
I hear.

Behind me is the murmurous sigh
And rustling of the forest trees,
While long or low as down the breeze
Comes song of birds afar and nigh,
And, sheaved into the one rebound,
One note on Echo's lips is found,
As if from one poetic brain,
The strain.

And thus from all the race ascends
Earth's myriad-sigh and song and prayer
Of hope, of anguish, pains, despair;
But gathered into one descends
Divine—not Echo, not rebound—
One answer from the Wise above.
'Tis love. AUSTIN ANDERSON.

A HIGH-CHURCH STORY.

You all remember the great hubbub that arose when the Rev. Peter Orricle set up a confessional in his church in St. Benedict's. There was a correspondence about it in the papers, the bishop interfered, and threatened legal proceedings. Mr. Orricle defied his bishop, but a mob having broken into the church one Sunday, and having smashed the the confessional, Mr. Orricle gave in. He fitted up an oratory in his house, set up a carved oak confessional in it (which had been presented to him by public subscription among his friends), and announced that he would hear confessions there. No act of parliament could prevent his doing that. The only person who would have had any right to object was Mrs. Orricle, but at that time there was no Mrs. Orricle.

Mr. Orricle did not marry Miss Ignatia Sturt until some weeks after he had reduced his confessional to silence, and it must be owned that if his lady parishioners had been aware of his matrimonial intentions, the subscriptions toward that new confessional in carved oak would not have been so abundant as they were. Mr. Orricle's marriage was not a popular proceeding. It was generally felt, some quarters as being a breach of faith, and he had to endure a good deal of chaff. "What does Mr. Orricle often talked through his nose about the single life being the blessed life? We are not laughing at him because he talked through a nose, for he was an infirmity of nature, but beyond doubt his utterances acquired additional degree of solemnity by passing through his nostrils, even as mere wind becomes musical by escaping through an organ pipe. The young ladies who poured the stories of their souls' torments into the celibate ears of Mr. Orricle were taken aback when they heard that he had reconsidered all his theories about single blessedness; and each said to herself, in alarm: "Suppose he should tell my secrets to that horrid girl, Nassie?"

For about a year after his marriage Mr. Orricle's confessional was deserted. The fear of Nassie kept penitents at a distance. There were even some girls who hinted when they met Mrs. Orricle, and fancied they could read in her looks that she knew a great deal about them. But this was not the case. Ignatia Orricle, during the first twelve-month of her wedded life, never made the remotest allusion to her husband's proceedings in the confessional. She was a sensible young woman, pretty not plain, with intelligent eyes and decorous manners—quite a pattern clergyman's wife. Perhaps she had no desire to see the confessional employed again. She herself had only come to it once before her marriage, and on that occasion she had confessed nothing amongst her things that she should inherit £1000 a year when her grandmother died. Another marriage, which followed close upon this revelation, she had nothing more to confess; for it never asked her husband to tell her of his peccadilloes, besides himself who kept a confessional open to all comers. It is worth observing, by-the-by, that married gentlemen who address confession seldom encourage their wives to go and confess their domestic shortcomings to members of the cloth. But Peter Orricle was an exception to this rule.

But a year after Mr. Orricle's marriage his wife's grandmother died and left Ignatia nothing. From this moment the vicar of St. Benedict became a miserable man, and his life was a burden to him. He discovered that there was something in the world worse than poverty, and began dismally to attribute to the absence of the dot the shortcomings of his wife, the rudeness of monkery and the gaucherie of manner she exhorted his parishioners to eschew, and unbosom themselves to Mr. Orricle had waxed plump and rosy on matrimony, they would have stayed away from him as a hand some man and doleful looks smiled him well. His sweet temper was also very touching when he was reproached. Women are notoriously painful; they say and do what Mr. Orricle was growing to dislike, and while they pitied the vicar, they were glad to "fix confessional with some secret charitable hope of making themselves disagreeable to Nassie.

They did not make themselves disagreeable to Nassie, but they were mistaken if they thought that Ignatia Orricle was going to submit meekly to being annoyed by them and by Mr. Orricle's nerves. Not one of your yearning women was to rush into tears, scream and scold. She had a tongue which could on occasion be rasper, and a keen, penetrating mind which, I imagine, like the shortest road out of a quandary, and treat on the same with a resolution worthy of the crisis had arrived in her domestic affairs. That disappointment about the grandmother's money was very grievous, and she was not responsible for it, and therefore, it followed her to see that she was not made to bear the penalty of it in the shape of a perpetual destruction of her communal happiness. Accordingly, to subdue her husband to bring him back into the paths of matrimonial propriety with a firm hand, and make of him a considerate and decent companion was her duty. In order to do this, she determined that the first step must be to abolish that confessional.

Ladies will acknowledge that Mrs. Orricle had some reason to be bitter. There were days when Mr. Orricle's oratory was full from noon till late, and all the evening moping in his study—sighing, groaning, snappish answers to simple and affectionate questions. He was continually receiving little notes on pink paper, and answering them in letters which filled four pages. Many of his penitents gave especial labor and trouble—Mrs. Donner, and a Miss Lydia Longnish. These ladies were after him at all times. They remained in his confessional for whole hours, and if they met the vicar in the street they affected to whisper confidentially in his ears, even if Mrs. Orricle were standing by. To make all this worse, they treated Mrs. Orricle with a cool politeness, bordering on contempt.

But Ignatia bore it all admirably. Neither by word nor sigh did she express her displeasure. Her husband was a priest, who did his clerical duty in conducting privately for long hours with sinful women. Why should she object to it? That was the line she seemed to have taken up; and the Rev. Peter went on his way, complacently imagining that he was free to act as he pleased, being, by the sacred character of his functions, above domestic criticism. He even accentuated his nasal twang; took frequent occasions to administer grave reproofs to his wife about trifles, and stalked about the parsonage with the air of a superior being, whom it was seemly for Ignatia to worship. Poor fellow!

Once a year the "superior being" used to go away for three days to visit his own parents, who lived in one of the northern counties. When the time came for this annual visit, Ignatia pleaded that she was too unwell to accompany her husband; so the Rev. Peter went off alone. This was the opportunity Ignatia had long been watching for—patiently as a cat watches a mouse—patiently as a jealous woman who seeks revenge.

The instant Mr. Orricle was gone, Ignatia packed off her servants for a two days' holiday, giving them money to go and see their friends; and then she shut up the parsonage, went to the railway station, and took the train. The same day she returned with a box containing a complete telephonic apparatus, and two workmen who were strangers to the parish.

The orders which Ignatia issued to these workmen were very precise. They must adapt the telephonic apparatus to the confessional in such a way that its presence should not be suspected, and the wires were to communicate with a closet in Mrs. Orricle's dressing-room. The workmen were not to leave the house until their work was done. They were to sleep at the parsonage; they should have all the beer they wanted, and a sovereign apiece besides their wages to hold their tongues when they went away.

On these terms the two men set to work very diligently, and in a few days they had executed their task with the utmost cleverness.

In a cavity produced by the carving inside the confessional, the tiniest hole, and no more, served the orifice of the telephone. The wires were drawn up through the wall and ceiling, and the receiving instrument was placed in the closet above mentioned, where Mrs. Orricle kept her dresses, and of which she alone had the key. The operation necessitated the removal of a part of the wainscoting in the closet, and of some of the paper above it, but the wainscote was put back in its place a few yards of new paper were procured from the upholsterer to replace that which had been torn off, and the ceiling was fresh white-washed to cover the spot where the hole had been made. Everything was neatly done, and Mrs. Orricle herself lent a hand to the work throughout. The two workmen went away perfectly satisfied, and thinking that the lady whose name they did not even know was a very pleasant and liberal person.

The Rev. Peter returned the next day, and, of course, suspected nothing of what had happened. He did not learn that his servants had been away, and he noticed no signs of disorder about the house. He resumed his duties in the confessional, Mrs Donner and Miss Longnish being as usual among the most assiduous penitents. But never very much after those truthful ladies uttered, and every syllable which the Rev. Peter answered through that melodious nose of his was carried straight up to Ignatia in her dress closet.

Ignatia was not so unwise as to bring matters to too rapid crisis. The telephone gave her the opportunity of learning all the secrets of the parish, and she got her money's worth out of it by listening during six whole months and holding her tongue. No doubt her ears and cheeks flamed at times, and she was sorely tempted to break out. There were occasions when she was moved by a violent desire to rush down stairs, seize the dog whip and make the Rev. Peter and his penitents dance writhing jigs out of the oratory into the street; but she restrained herself, for she was a prudent woman. "Vengeance," say the Italians, "is a dish which should be eaten cold."

At the end of six months, however, the head mastership of an important grammar school in the parish of St. Benedict fell vacant. The salary was £1000, with a residence and extra tuition fees. Now, of all men on the clergy list, Mr. Orricle was the least likely to get this post, and he did not even think of applying for it. But Ignatia resolved that it should be given him, and that the should hold it along with his living. He could take an extra curate to look after the parish, and if the school threw hard work upon him, so much the better, he would find the less time and inclination for talking with women like Mrs. Donner and Miss Longnish.

It was on a fine winter morning. The Rev. Peter had just breakfasted solemnly, yet heartily, after his wont; Ignatia had said little during that meal. As her husband was about to leave the room, however, she stopped him, and there was a look on her face which he had never seen there before.

"Peter, I want to say a few words to you," she began. "I object to your receiving Mrs. Donner and Miss Longnish into this house any more. They are immodest and improper women, and I shall tell them so if they come here again."

"What do you mean?" asked the Rev. Peter, scarcely believing his ears.

"I mean what I say, dear. I cannot any longer permit the objectional and the sensational conversations which go on between you and all the bad women of our parish in that confessional. A woman to have it removed, and the oratory devoted to other uses."

"Are you mad?" asked Mr. Orricle.

"No, dear; only resolved not to be any longer slighted in my own house. Just come into the oratory with me. I will show you a telephone, by which I have heard every word you and those women have been saying for the last six months."

If we succeed in ridding the state of the Chinese, we will soon see a boom in real estate, a boom in business circles, caused by a general flow of industry and prosperity.

If the organization takes place, I agree to subscribe $25 towards the movement and I think I can raise $500 among my friends in twenty-four hours.

The Rev. Peter returned the next day, and, of course, suspected nothing of what had happened. He did not learn that his servants had been away, and he noticed no signs of disorder about the house. He resumed his duties in the confessional, Mrs Donner and Miss Longnish being as usual among the most assiduous penitents. "Vengeance," say the Italians, "is a dish which should be eaten cold."

"Good gracious!" was all Mr. Orricle could say; but he took up his Gloucester hat, and went forth feeling much the same sensations as a donkey must experience when he is saddled and bridled for the first time.

Mr. Orricle became a very good headmaster, and the ritual of his church underwent considerable alteration. Mrs. Orricle took that department into her own hands. As to the confessional in carved oak, it was transformed into a commodious linen cupboard.

How to Cross-Examine.

Boston Transcript.

Lawyer—You say you know Mr. Smith?

Witness—Yes, sir.

Lawyer—You swear you know him?

Witness—Yes, sir.

Lawyer—You mean that you are acquainted with him?

Witness—Yes, sir; acquainted with him.

Lawyer—Oh, you don't know him; you are merely acquainted with him. Remember you are on your oath, sir. Now, be careful. You don't mean to tell the court that you know all about Mr. Smith, everything he ever did?

Witness—No, I suppose—

Lawyer—Never mind what you suppose. Please answer my question. Do you, or do you not, know everything that Mr. Smith ever did?

Witness—No; I—

Lawyer—That'll do, sir. No, you do not. Very good. So you are not acquainted with all his acts?

Witness—Of course—

Lawyer—Stop there. Are you, or are you not?

Witness—No.

Lawyer—That is to say, you are not so well acquainted with him as you thought you were?

Witness—Possibly not.

Lawyer—Just so. Now we begin to understand each other. If you don't know anything about Mr. Smith's acts when you are not with him, you can't swear that you know him, can you?

Witness—If you put it that way—

Lawyer—Come, sir, don't seek to evade my question. I'll put it to you again. When you say you know Mr. Smith, you don't mean to say you know everything he does?

Witness—No, sir; of course not.

Lawyer—Just so; of course not. Then you were not quite correct when you said you knew Mr. Smith.

Witness—No, sir.

Lawyer—In point of fact, you don't know Mr. Smith?

Witness—No, sir.

Lawyer—Ah, I thought so. That'll do, sir; you can stand down.

He Missed That.

Just before the Michigan third infantry entered upon the red-hot fight at Fair Oaks a private in one of the companies stepped forward to bid captain and said:

"Captain, are you going to fall in?"

"I expect we are."

"And some of us will get killed?"

"Like as not."

"Then I'd like to speak to the chaplain a minute."

"What for?"

"I don't feel prepared to die, captain."

"But you can't leave your company. You must take your chances whether you are prepared or not. That's what you enlisted for."

"Yes, I know so," crawled the man in low tones, as he went to look for rebels down in the woods, "and I was fool enough to disliver that Uncle Sam didn't care a copper whether I went to other I'd been shot out of his service. You bet he doesn't get any more recruits from our town till that part is settled."

The Objections to Logan's Bill.

Chicago Tribune.

When the bill was proposed there was another measure before congress, and that was to tax the rich whiskey and donate it to the liquor interests, on the ground that the government did not need the money, having enough revenue without it. That bill, which Gen. Logan's bill was proposed was intended to antagonize and to repeal a specific tax by promising a specific use for it, and that the country might fully understand the point involved, present the alternative of using for the cause of annual revenue as a present or bounty to the distillers and manufacturers of whisky or voting the same sum to the support of schools in the several states.

VARIOUS ITEMS.

A Practical way to Work—How to get rid of the Chinese in Ninety Days.

Letter in San Francisco Bulletin.

If all cause giving them employment, an exodus eastward will soon commence. Let Henry Ward Beecher have a taste of these Chinese whom he so much loves. Let the constituents of Mr. Hour have a few thousand to replace their factory boys and girls, and I dare say their next representative will not be so loud-mouthed in their favor in congress.

Let us, all, both poor and rich, men and women, vow from this day forth we will have no dealings whatever with Chinese, and in ninety days we will commence to feel the effect of our unified action.

Let us no wait to see whether a new bill is passed. In the first place it is not probable that the accidental president will sign any bill which will give us any material relief, and even if a bill should pass, before we feel the effects of it, unless we protect ourselves as we will be inundated by Chinese who will crowd out our own laborers and keep white immigrants from the state.

Let the board of trade or some other respectable body take the matter immediately in hand; call a meeting, be called; the people to second the movement, I am sure, man. Success is in our power; if we do not reach out our hands to grasp it, we are unworthy any relief.

If we succeed in ridding the state of the Chinese, we will soon see a boom in real estate, a boom in business circles, caused by a general flow of industry and prosperity.

If the organization takes place, I agree to subscribe $25 towards the movement and I think I can raise $500 among my friends in twenty-four hours.

Clara Louise Kellogg's Debut.

Now that Clara Louise Kellogg is to retire from the stage, the following incident of her first appearance may not be inappropriate. Brignoli was at that time the favorite tenor of New York, and had consented to sing at her debut, though expressing a poor opinion of Americans as singers. They came on together, and he was fully expected to warble quite an insulting air of Italian affection to her, instead of which he had arranged with the orchestral gang, and he simply chuckled out a couple of bars and came to a dead stop. Kellogg had a velvet jacket on her back, an Oriental cap broidered on on her head, and the worst stage fright ever felt by mortal flew over her open mouth. The venerable old big fiddle croaked loudly. All the little fiddles squeaked, and one just heard the faintest squeak of Clara Louise. On went the accompaniment, and the debutante felt the ground slipping from under her feet. She got outspoken, unassisting, deeper, when from out an orchestra seat, three rows away, came the strain she was struggling with, clear, true, sweet as a lark. That helping voice steadied her, gave her heart, the right key, the proper breath. She looked, and there she beheld Carlotti Patti half raised in her seat, beating time with her little gloved hand. Patti's bright face was the beacon for Kellogg's bark. And Kellogg took heart and pitched in and sung out, and Carlotta fell away when she could go it alone, having performed a graceful act.
